Dogs Called into Question

Ellen, Joe, and An Innate Desire to Discover the Truth

Dogs. Yeah, dogs are real, right? That's what we all thought. Incredible new evidence submitted by our correspondent Joe Doyle suggests an alternate truth. The image in question is printed below for your own analysis:

The impressive qualities of this image do not stop at the big red circle, however. Consider the dog-like creature prominently featured on the right. This non-dog drives home the nature and severity of our collective delusion. It's just not a dog. It can't be. Didn't you read the caption?

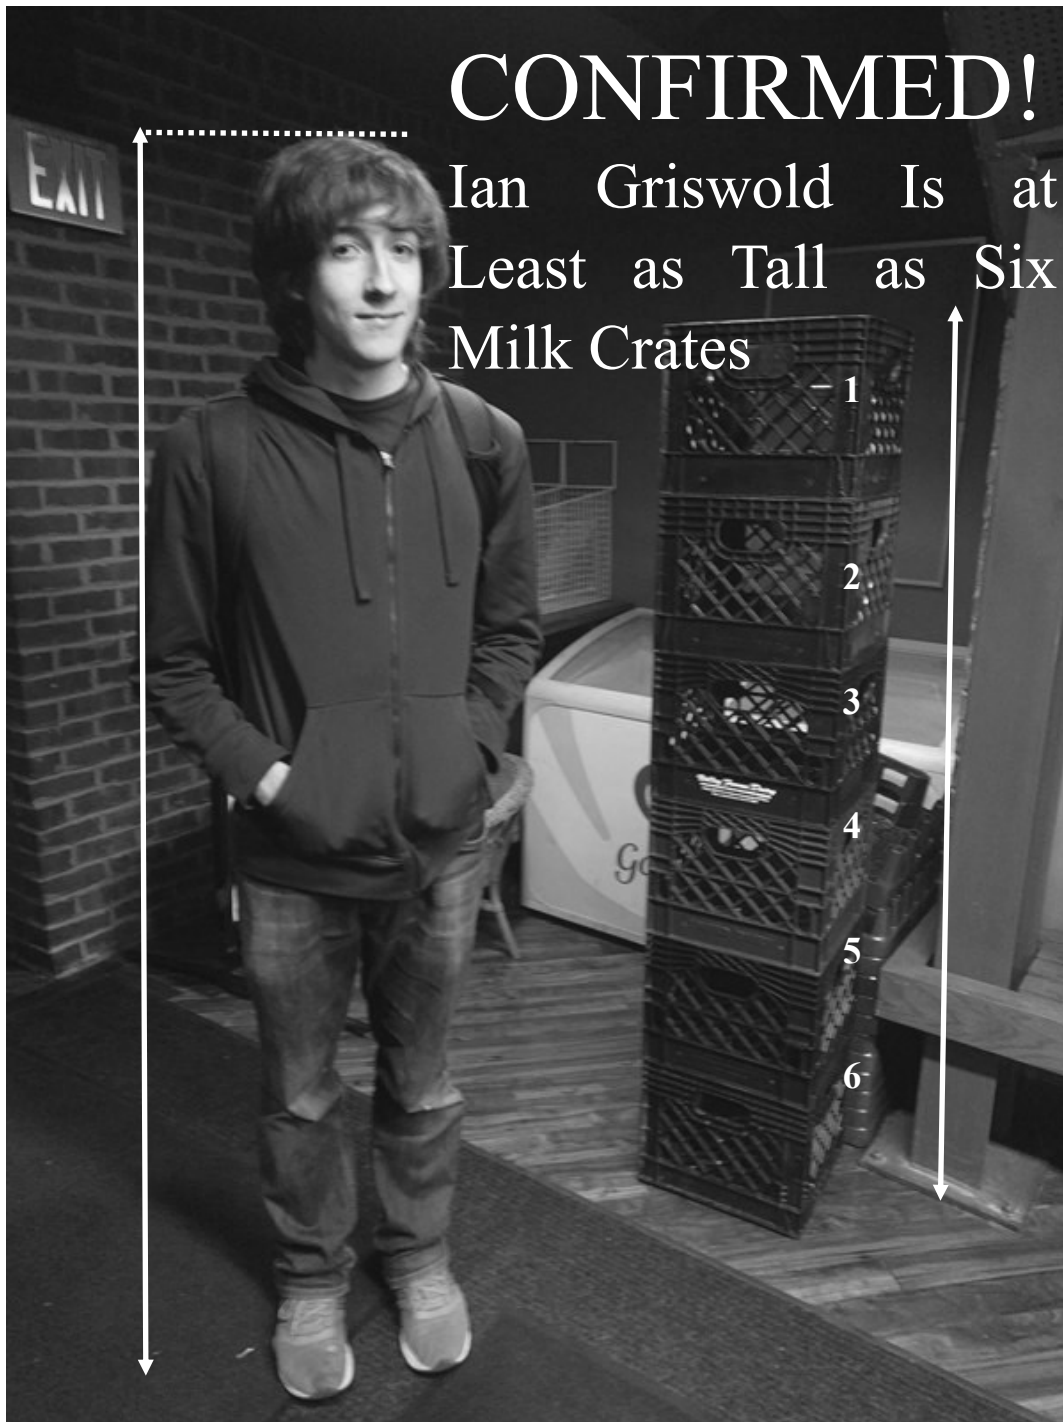

Based on this powerfully persuasive picture alone, the case seems to be closed. Let's examine this further.

First, I'd like to point out the large circle in the middle of the image with a line drawn through it. In case you're the curious sort, yes, the circle is red when in color. Convincing, right? How is one to argue with a big red circle? Well, readers, I've tried it myself, for the sake of this article. It simply cannot be done. The big red circle maintains its position despite questioning.

"Dogs aren't real and you've never seen one."
And that just about sums it up.

It's sad, but it's true. We've got no dogs, people. Zippo. Zilch. Nada. Ce n'est pas un chien.

UPDATE: I just saw a dog outside. I'm relieved to call off this investigation. Imagine no dogs—oh, God! Declare it to the heavens—Dogs! Dogs are! DOGS.
