An Interview with Francis G. Johnson

[ES] Mr. Johnson, I admire your work very much, especially Classification System Up to 4k. I was wondering if you could shed light on your thought process behind this video? What is the American Matrix based on? (And, less importantly, what is the significance of McMinnville?)

[Whoever Answers the Emails at gjohnce@gmail] Appreciate the feedback Ellen, if you're from Yamhill county then we may have crossed paths at one point. Submit those questions in HD video and you will get them answered. Keep us posted.

— End of interview —

Editor's comments: The editor would look favorably on a motion to a) allocate funds for a KGB field trip to Yamhill County or b) submit questions in HD video. Otherwise the editor would look favorably on other submissions of gjo[rresponde]hnce (direct queries to gjohnce@gmail.com) so that we here at Pravda? can continue to investigate this phenomenon.

The Battle of Donner Ditch

Henry Hausman, Pravda? Geopolitics Correspondent

Fifty years of peace. Ever since the Unification Wars of 1967, a series of Presidents* had kept the peace in the kingdoms of Carnegie and Mellon. Then the Lord Subra left. The reasons why are lost to the historical record. But he disappeared. When he did, the twin kingdoms collapsed. The successor to Subra, Interim-Lord Farnham, was reduced to the leader of the Sureshi Remnant, a small imperium who's dominion didn't reach beyond Warner Hall. Elsewhere on Campus, new powers were rising to fill the power vacuum. There was a mad dash to claim territory and resources. The Tepper Trade Federation attempted to establish a kingdoms wide council. But, for the first several months there was no major bloodshed. Some of the Frats engaged in minor raids, but they were essentially ignored by the other powers. It seemed as if the uneasy peace would last. Until the 1st Battle of Donner Ditch (1BDD).

It started with a petition from Donner House to join the Federation of the Hill. The Federation rejected the offer (duh), but suggested the residents of Donner seek the protection from the nearby Architecture Union. The Archies were incensed by the grave insult. The precise chain of events is unknown, but by the next day a Hill Army was marching on the Union stronghold of Margaret Morrison, demanding they annex Donner. The Archies sent their own forces to defend and fortify the Donner Ditch. War had begun.

The main question of the battle was as follows: could the vast number of Hill shock troops take on the fortifications of the Union? The answer was a resounding no. Despite the sheer ferocity of soldiers raised in the hellish pits of Hammerschlag and Scobel, the Archies built walls. With, like, a catapult. Hill forces charged down into the ditch and were promptly slaughtered. The Federation was forced to surrender and annex Donner house. It was something they would never forgive the Architecture Union for. Thus, the 1st Battle of Donner Ditch was over. But behind the scenes, something was building. A fire was about to erupt.
