PRAVDA? MADE TO MAKE IT SEEM LIKE I ACTUALLY WROTE PRAVDA?

As I write this, it is currently 4:12, on January 19, 2026. This means there are 48 minutes left until the beginning of GBM. I spent the whole winter break without writing any Pravda? This was a massive misuse of resources. The fact there was nothing written over such a large amount of time is simply embarrassing. Last week I thought, “next week will be my week! I will actually write something of substance.” What a fool I was. It is now 4:15 and I still have nothing. So to make it seem like I’ve actually been productive, I am writing this. From afar, this Pravda? seems like it was well written and made with thought and care, but as keen readers can tell, the opposite is quite true. It is now 4:17 and I have been told to include the quote “I like my men bi and large.” This quote, said in WEH 5201 at 4:16, made by the philosopher Gavin Radford. The large amount of conversation occurring on the other side of the room is rather distracting. Daniel Yin is sitting next to me also doing “productive work.” So, readers may ask “what’s the point of writing this at all? There is no shame in not showing up with Pravda?.” This is false. The shame is immeasurable. I can feel every single soul staring down at me for each GBM I arrive empty handed. It is now 4:22. Time is passing. It will take us all. At this point, I am only writing words. There is no thought made before my fingers tap the keyboard. There is a standing rule that Benner has to throw a Pravda? paper airplane at me. I wonder if she will read this and do it. If not, we can send her to the corner of shame. That would be funny. Right? It is now 4:23 and I think I’m gonna stop writing soon. What else is there to really talk about. It is now 4:24.
